The State Department, it is understood, will particularly resist any attempt by Great Britain to make the freedom of American shipping dependent upon the attitude of the neutral governments with respect to re-exportation of contraband. While petitor admitting nor denying the While neither admitting nor denying the right of Great Britain to interfere, with nts of contraband to neutral countries, the State Department will not admit any right to make such interferences rest on the basis of British arrangements with third parties. Interferences will have to be justified on the vrounds of inational law and precedent with re-to contraband of war and the rights belligerent with respect to neutral

The British must, therefore, produce evidence of an actual beligerent destina-tion of such shipments as that on the Kroonland. It is believed that consign-ment "to order," as in the case of the Kroonland's cargo, will be offered by Great Britain as evidence indicating that Naples was to be merely a point in the voyage of the cargo, and not the ultimate destination.

It has already been declared by Great Britain that shipments of contraband "to order" will be viewed with suspicion un-til positive evidence of a genuinely neutral destination is produced.

Await Court's Decision.

There will be no action by the State Department in the case of the Kroon-land prior to the decision of the prize This government has reached the conclusion that it will enter no general bill of complaint against the policy of Great Britain, but will meet each case as it arises, both with regard to seizures, and also with respect to the new list of contraband, which contains many things objectionable to the United States. Unfavorable decisions by prize courts will be the basis of the discussions likely to take place.

It is expected that one of the features of the British arguments in defense of the radical positions it is taking with the radical positions it is taking with regard to contraband and situments to neutral countries adjoining Germany will be the claim that the changed conditions of war compel her wide departures from precedent. The British also expect much from the knowledge that the United States government must bear in mind that some day it may itself be at war, and in the present position of Great British. Consequently, it cannot demand of Great Britain mere than it would be willing to give were the United States engaged in maritime warfare under modingaged in maritime warfare under mod-
